FOREWORD

The following has been a labor of love. It has entailed a couple of years of work, untold numbers of letters back and forth to Terre Haute, many phone calls, several trips to the Terre Haute library, quite a few rewrites, and several headaches from trying to keep the families and marriages straight.

My mother married Monte Hanna when I was just into grade school. He is a fine and honest man, and no person could ask for a more decent and thoughtful stepfather. I married Rachel Nasser. Her father, Essa N. Nasser, was one of the nicest men I have ever met, quiet, honest, kind, a real gentleman. His given name was Esau and he used to joke that the admitting official of the Immigration Authority at Ellis Island must never have read the Bible, to make such a mistake. So he had to live with Essa the rest of this life. Rachel's mother, Tafaha, was the hardest working and most outgoing lady I ever knew. Her reputation in Terre Haute for cooking and sewing and sharing and giving of herself and anything she owned was legend among the Syrians. Her father owned the largest home in Ine Isha'ara, which made it the logical meeting place, and almosst made him the mayor, although no such title was given.

During our long research, we ran into many family tragedies, and several cases of our own personal knowledge, and others reported to us, of stillborn babies and those that lived only a snort time. We have intentionally left out mention of most of these, as they serve no purpose to be listed now.

Most families cooperated freely, although we were told once or twice that someone "couldn't be bothered".

Dates and names and addresses of family heads, where found, indicate the first appearance in either a phone book or city directory. This raises a question, since we know many of the families were here earlier, why weren't they listed. Didn't they want to be included in a census? Didn't they understand what as required of asked of them? And surely some of the businesses had phones earlier that we found. Perhaps we just didn't locate the correct telephone books.

And another question. Why didn't more families come over? Or, to put it differently, did everyone come to America that wanted to?

Over the years we have heard again and again discussions of the folly of the various store owners in not forming their own cooperative. If the average wholesale bill was a few hundred dollars a week, multiplied by 60 some stores, a sizeable business could have been established. And that would have furnished jobs for many other family members. It is an opportunity lost, and surely one that should have been taken advantage of.

You will find in this booklet 57 families listed, with over 1600 names, and about 360 marriages. Of course there are names that appear in more than one place. We would never intentionally leave out anyone. Be assured that much effort was made to locate each person, and name them. We apologize ahead of time for any errors or omissions. They are truly mistakes and unfortunate

It is perhaps regrettable that it is not possible to name family members according to age. We have added names as information became available and attempting to make sure they were in order of birth would just have cost us too much time.

We list marriages to Syrians, or others. An m followed by a period means married to, as m. John Brown. We did not list m. German, or m. Italian, although most of those are known to us. We were primarily interested in marriages to Syrians and thought it best not to make mistakes with other nationalities.

A first marriage will follow under a name. If there were other marriages, we have tried to list them so that your eye can follow down the same column. And if known, we will list the residence of a mate.

Lots of help was given and we must thank Salwa (Mrs. Louis) Nasser, John and Loretta Nasser, Mary (daughter of Richard) Nasser, and especially Monte Hanna, Emmaline Freije Watson and Esther Nasser Dorsey.

AN IMMIGRATION STORY

SYRIA - a country at the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea, containing 71,500 square miles of territory, twice the size of Indiana. It consists of 50% desert, but only 30% of the remainder is under cultivation.

The population is 9,800,000 (2 times that of Indiana), 90% of which are Arabs, and 40% are literate. At present 87% of the people are Moslem, and 13% Christian, although there were not that many Christians in 1900. The predominate Christian religion is Greek Orthodox. 3% of the total population are Druze, an offshoot of Islam, the religion of Iran.

The capital of Syria is Damascus, one of the oldest continuously inhabited cities in the world, perhaps as early as 2500 B. C. Old atlases show Elba, northeast of Damascus, as early as 3500 B. C., with Damascus about 2000 B. C., and Beirut not until 1500 A. D. Syria was conquered by the Romans in 31 B. C., by the Mongols in 1250 A. D., and again by the Ottoman Empire in 1517 A. D. The Islamic religion spread into Syria after 632 A. D.

At the turn of the century, and shortly thereafter, there emigrated to America a group of people, most all relatives, from a tiny town in Syria. This is the story of their relationships, their families, the way they made their livelihood, the progress of their children, and eventually the dilution and Americanization of the families.

INE ISHA'ARA, SYRIA

Translated, the name means hair spring. INE is fountain or spring in Arabic (also means eye). The word THE is Il, with the l being dropped in this case. Hair is Sha'ara - hence Ine Isha'ara. Literally it means a spring so tiny as to resemble a hair.

Those who came to America have various spellings for the name of the town, including:

Ine El Shari
Ein El Shari
Ein El Shara
Ein El Charra
Ein Al Shara
Ein Al Shari

Surprisingly, in a letter from a former inhabitant of the town, the name was spelled three different ways on one page. And some translate it to mean Eye of the Fountain.

The country of Lebanon was created from the western part of Syria in 1943.

The Isha'ara is a town of a few hundred people, living in stone houses built among mountain springs, about 25 miles west of Damascus. The population is approximately half Druze and half Christian, the Christians being mainly Greek Orthodox. After 1850 the Presbyterians did missionary work there, converting a few families, and their efforts led to the large Presbyterian Church in Damascus, and the University in Beirut. The Christians were mostly farmers, working for the more wealthy Druze land owners. Whole families lived in one house, raising sheep and goats and maintaining small gardens. Water was carried to the homes from the springs, and laundry was done at the springs.

The houses had outside stair cases leading to flat roofs where the nights were spent in hot weather, and where the men gathered after the evening meal. Families ate seated on the dirt floor around a large hollowed out stone in which food was placed. They ate with fingers or scooped up food with pieces of bread. There were some wooden utensils available. The round 'loaves' of bread were baked in sheets about three feet across and very thin, allowing it to be torn easily. The men ate first, the women and children after.

A belief taken from the Bible was that the only meat fit to eat came from animals with more than one stomach, so pigs were not eaten. The main diet was vegetables, corn, wheat, and some fruit. Very little meat was available; some beef, chicken, but mostly lamb and mutton, and a lot of goat meat as goats were plentiful. Beef was generally obtainable only when an animal was ill or died, and then the meat was shared by the village. Mainstays of a meal were cabbage, cauliflower, eggplant, green beans, tomatoes, and rarely rice. Lean lamb or goat meat was ground, mixed with wheat and chopped onions and served raw with melted butter - Kibby. It was also fried like hamburgers, baked in flat pans, and fried in roundish, avocado shaped rolls, hollowed out and stuffed with ground meat and pinon nuts. Cabbage or wild grape leaves were rolled around lamb, rice and tomatoes, cooked and served. Another popular dish was Khawarma, meat ground or pounded, cooked for hours and stored in salted fat for the winter months. It was served with scrambled eggs flavored with Cummin. Labon - a soured milk resembling yogurt is also a staple. There were few deserts, but sweet dough, filled with nut meats, baked and topped with sugar syrup was served. At Easter time Ka'ick, an anise flavored bread, was served with tea or coffee. The fruits available were figs, dates, pomegranates, melons and citrus. The bread was baked on a stone hearth; sticks, leaves and dried manure was the fuel. It was customary to eat and drink when visiting so as not to offend the hostess, who would tell you "If you don't like my food, you don't like me".

There was a small cottage industry of sewed goods. Periodically the leader of the town, who owned a camel or donkey, would gather the products and visit neighboring communities, selling and trading the various handiworks.

Dogs were looked down on as scavengers and not kept as pets, although they might at times help with the sheep. One lady reports that they kept a large snake in the yard and it definitely helped keep away strangers.

The main alcoholic drink was an anisette or licorice bevarage. Women were not allowed alcohol, nor were they permitted to smoke. Men danced together in a line, with a leader twirling a handkerchief, in the Greek manner. Women danced alone, with the other ladies forming a circle and clapping a rhythm. Their dance closely resembles a hula or belly dance. The music was supplied by a mizwije, a flute like instrument, and another reseembling a guitar, called an ouid.

All marriages were arranged by the parents. There was no social contact between the bride and groom before the marriage. If a baby boy was born, it was customary for guests to give money and bless the baby, if a girl baby came, nothing. At the first tooth of a boy baby, a party was held at which guests were served wheat cooked in a sweetened water.

At a funeral there was much crying and wailing, and women familiar with the deceased would sing parts of the the dead persons life, followed again by crying and wailing. Food and drink were served at the funeral by the deceased's family.

This was pretty much the life style in Ine Isha'ara, Syria, in 1895. In the country as a whole, the Christians were a great minority and seeking a better way of life. It was natural for them to look to America, and as difficult as it was, some of them began to make the journey. It must be remembered that to get into America one had to passs a physical examination to show them to be free of disease, they had to have a little money, and a destination, plus the passage fare over. And it wasn't always easy to get the preliminary papers from the American Embassy in their own country. Plus the fact that they had to get to the embassy, which in this case was a 25 mile walk, each way, and generally entailed several trips, and in most cases also a bribe for the officials.

Following is an account of some of the families that did successfully make the transition from Syria to Terre Haute, Indiana.

As a rule a man would come to America, become a citizen, work for a while, and then return to Syria to marry or to bring his wife and family back. The naturalization laws were constantly changing then, and even today. At times a wife became a citizen just by marrying a citizen. And the children also. But this was not always the case. In the late 1960's, two of the children of E. N. Nasser who were born in Syria in the early 1920's, found out to their sorrow that they had been required to file for American citizenship before they were age 21. Not being aware of this, they then had to either take Citizenship classes, or go through the laborious process of gathering all the papers required by the Naturalization department to obtain a Derivative and green card. This required a copy of the marriage certificate from the Presbyterian Church in Damascus, letters from residents of Ine Isha'ara to the effect that neither parent was married at the time of this marriage, letters from citizens that they were present when the children were born, even the name of the boat bringing the family to Ellis Island. The two involved each chose to select different routes and became 'citizens' almost 50 years after living here, voting, owning property and being in business all of that time. Getting Social Security cards had not brought the problem to light.

The first Syrian in Terre Haute was Kaleel Hanna, who had married, left his wife in Syria and came to Fort Wayne, Indiana, where there were other Syrian families, the Malooley's and the Farrah's. Kaleel came to Fort Wayne in 1898, went back after his wife in 1900, and his first son was born in Fort Wayne in 1901. He moved the family to Terre Haute in 1902, where his other ten children were born. He became a citizen in 1908.

Other Syrian families that came to Terre Haute later are as follows, though not in order of arrival: Azar, Brown (Gibran), Corey, David, Ellis, Freije, Farrah, George, Kassis, Laham, Maloof, Malooley, Mareena, Nasser, Rassie, Saikley, Shahadey, Shaker and Tanoos.

Kay Hanna was a peddler and operated a dry goods store. Many of the heads of the families that came later were peddlers, traveling the countryside, selling their goods to farmers wives, and sleeping in barns or wherever they could, returning to Terre Haute at times to replenish their goods and visit their families. Hanna helped most new arrivals, supplying them with goods to sell, helping them with finances and assistance bringing their families over. The peddlers sold almost any sort of household needs, but concentrated on Oriental rugs. Later the men began opening small businesses, mainly neighborhood groceries, and helping others to open businesses. Finally there were small groceries and businesses owned by Syrians on many corners in Terre Haute. Kay himself built an empire of businesses, farms, buildings and other real estate worth over one million dollars, before business set-backs and poor investment judgements wiped it all out.

The number of groceries owned by Syrians grew through the 1920's and 1930's until 1942 when there were 64 such neighborhood grocery stores, 27 owned by Nassers. The families and number of groceries operated in that year is as follows:

Azar - 3

- Corey - 9
- David - 2
- Farrah - 1
- Freije - 2
- Hanna - 3
- Kassis - 4
- Laham - 2
- Maloof - 1
- Malooley 2
- Nasser - 27
- Rassie - 1
- Shahadey - 3
- Tanoos - 4

This number had dwindled to five in 1987.

Because of the influence of super markets, and the desire of children not to follow in their father's footsteps, various other types of businesses were entered into. The second and third generations had such varied livelihoods and careers as (but not limited to):

- Restuarants - 8
- Taverns - 8
- Automobile dealers - 4
- Advertising - 3
- Retail shoes - 2
- Attorney - 3
- Pool hall - 1
- TV repair - 2
- Beauty shop - 2
- Insurance - 2
- Furniture - 3
- Children's clothes - 1
- Post office - 1
- Hospital administration - 1
- Oriental rugs - 2
- Education - 3
- Law enforcement - 3
- Chiropractor - 2
- Medical doctor - 2
- Real estate - 4
- Motel - 1
- Accounting - 3
- Career military service 3
- Food catering - 2
- Civil engineering - 1
- Priesthood - 1
- Retail sales - 5

Endeavors such as those listed above eventually had an impact on the entire community, along with the eventual intermarriages with Americans. As other immigrants had found before them, the Syrians were looked down on and suffered the same discrimination by the community at large. The children had to suffer the indignity of being called such nicknames as 'Hunky, wop or dago' by their schoolmates, a designation not at all applicable in this case, and showing the ignorance of the ones doing the name calling. They were not welcome to date other races and were not chosen for membership in clubs. It was years before Syrians were accepted into such social lodges as the Masons, Elks, Moose and eventually the Shrine.

Regardless of their background and schooling, or lack of it, the men were good at business. They worked long, hard hours, 14 hour days and 6 and 7 day weeks were normal. And they were proficient at numbers. It was not at all uncommon for a man who could not read or write English to have a thriving business, lovely home, nice car, and own many pieces of property. But aside from the grocery stores, few early outside business ventures were successful, perhaps because of the discrimination mentioned.

The families were oriented firstly towards work, and secondly toward their relatives. Almost any condition would be endured to see that the business and family prospered. As the tiny groceries were opened, the family lived behind or above the store. Some lived in tiny apartments or with relatives while getting started. They had few conveniences at first. Running water and electricity would come later. Probably very few city raised Americans could realize the efforts put out by the new immigrants.

Mother and children helped run the store. Father had to leave at times to go for produce, or pay bills, or run other necessary errands. To help create a profit, the wife would can foods so sell in the store, and also sew and sell their towels and doilies and handkerchiefs in the store along with groceries. Fruits and vegetables not quite good enough to sell were cleaned up and consumed by the family if possible. Indeed, pennies count. However, it was always important that the family had the best of meats.

First and foremost in the Arabic family was the unquestioned position of authority and superiority of the male. Men were fed first at mealtime, their every wish was catered to, their decisions and comings and goings were never discussed or disputed. Their actions and opinions were absolutely the rule of the house. Wealth is passed from father to son, without regard for daughters. This tradition is positively not understood by Americans

Large families were expected and encouraged. E. N. Nasser, perhaps not a good example as he had married his dead brother's widow and therefore was no longer acceptable to the Orthodox Church, stated that heaven was centered in children and grandchildren. Quoting a commandment from his hand-written Bible brought over from the old country, he read "Thou shalt not countenance a poor man in his cause", (yes, there are more than 10 commandments). He took this literally to mean that a church would more gladly welcome a rich person than a poor one, and therefore a large family was his heaven on earth. At his death he had six children and eighteen grandchildren, an average family.

It was as many as twenty or thirty years before arranged marriages became fewer and Syrians began marrying out of their race. Outside marriages were discouraged and made difficult by parents.

Among the first generation there were 92% marriages, Syrian marrying Syrian. In the next generation 55% of their children married Syrians, and in the next generation the number had dropped to 27%. There was quite a lot of intermarriages in families. As the Nasser's were the most numerous, this would lead to Nasser marrying Nasser, although this happened in other families also.

As the stores began to prosper, the families moved to better homes and away from the tiny area of town where they had all originally settled. Because of the natural tendency for the Syrians to group together as they arrived in Terre Haute, many women never became fluent in English. They really didn't have to be. They were always among Arabic speaking people, and if necessary had their children to translate for them.

Just as the WASP community disliked any foreigner, without any cause for that dislike, the Syrians have an in-bred hatred for Jews. One older Syrian lady always stated her feelings and talked of what terrible people the Jews were. One time she fed and entertained a red-haired, freckled faced Jewish M. D. in her home for an entire day, and after he left was exclaiming what a nice man he was. When told he was Jewish she was flabbergasted. He was the first Jew she had ever met personally.

A few of the Syrian immigrants had become Presbyterians in the old country but the majority remained Orthodox, and the latter have had two churches in Terre Haute, the latest with a large attached hall for weddings, dinners and other social events. This tends to keep some of the younger folks aware of their traditions, especially the food and music. Music is available from Syria on tape and records. Many of the men in the first generation subscribed to an Arabic language newspaper from New York, but now only a very few can read Arabic, or write it, and these are mainly recent arrivals. And only a few of the second and third generation are fluent in the language. Some of the first generation had brought with them Bibles written in Aramic.

There is still some visiting between the Syrians in Terre Haute and Syrian colonies in other cities, mainly Indianapolis, Cairo, Illinois and Canton, Ohio. And occasionally even a marriage between the groups, which helps bring them together. But as is expected, and perhaps inevitable and desired, the marriages out of the race has slowly done away with the habits and customs.

It was common practice for foreigners to gather into racial groups in certain areas. These assemblies were known throughout Europe as Ghettos. But I doubt that such a large group from such a tiny town can be duplicated anywhere in the United States. They were glad and proud to be in America, were good citizens, and a credit to their community. They participated in public affairs, paid their taxes reluctantly just like native Americans, and have been gradually assimilated into the local population.
